Email 2 Example: “Do you ever get tired at 3 p.m.?”

Hey NAME,

One of the biggest issues I had as a parent was the tiredness that I would get right around the 3:00 or 4:00 time period every afternoon.

No matter what I did, I always felt exhausted—especially when the kids would come home and have a ton of energy.

It was super frustrating because I felt like I wasn't being the dad I wanted to be.

Have you ever felt like this?

If you're like the majority of Americans, this is something that you experience frequently.

According to a study done recently, 88% of parents in America feel tired and run down in the afternoon and before dinner.

The solution to this for me ended up being a lot simpler than I imagined.

I had tried everything: energy drinks, nootropics, a standing desk, drinking a big glass of ice water...

But it came down to what I was eating for lunch.

I noticed that anytime I had a meal with high carbs like rice, tortillas chips, French fries, or burger buns, I always felt low afterwards.

So here's my challenge to you: For the next 7 days, focus on a lunch that is high in fruits, vegetables, and protein, and eliminate all your carbohydrates at lunch.

This could be the main thing that you've been missing to have the energy that you want.

I am curious though, have you ever experienced this? If so, what have you done to fix the issue and did it work?

Email 3 Example: "How I fixed my sugar cravings"

NAME,

As a busy dad, one issue I always had was a massive sweet tooth.

This got harder and harder as I dealt with kids having snacks in the house and finishing up the last half of an Uncrustable... I wouldn't want food to go to waste after all! This started to massively impact my energy and my waistline.

I always felt like I was craving something sweet... especially in the middle of the day as a snack and then after dinner.

My wife and I ended up going to see a specialist to help us fix this.

In addition to a bunch of supplements (which I'm not sure worked), she gave us three simple steps that I now use anytime I need to reset and break my sugar addiction.

1. Drink a glass of water first thing in the morning with a tablespoon of apple cider vinegar and lemon juice.
2. Walk for 5 to 10 minutes after each meal.
3. Fast for 24 hours once a week.

They're so simple, but every single time I put these into effect for 4–5 days, it makes a huge impact.

If you're dealing with a sugar addiction or a sweet tooth that you can't seem to manage, I'd love to hear what would happen if you tried these simple steps.

For the next 5 days, do the water and the walks after meals, and then on day four or five throw in a 24-hour fast. (I do this by finishing dinner and then not eating till dinner the next night.)

This is just one of the easy ways we help our clients in the Fit Parent Project overcome sugar addictions without relying on willpower.

I'd love to know what results you got from just implementing these easy steps.

Let me know if you ever experienced the sugar cravings and if you have a solution that's worked for you in the past.

Email 4 Example: "Is this your problem?"

Self-assessment time...

What do YOU feel like is your biggest struggle when it comes to reaching your goals?

Odds are, the words you thought of were...

Consistency, willpower, and discipline.

You know what to do, but you just don't do it.

The most common answer to this question is willpower.

We are tough self-critics when it comes to our shortcomings.

Research shows that most people believe their struggles are due to a lack of willpower.

And I'm here to call B.S.

You might be thinking... I can never control myself around a hot plate full of brownies!
(Or maybe that's just me...)

Or binging TikTok before bed...

Or 6 beers at the baseball game...

And that might be the case.

But I'm here to tell you that it's not a willpower issue.

It's thinking that you need more willpower to be successful.

Do you know what people who achieve their goals and maintain them think?

EMAIL RESOURCE GUIDE TEMPLATES

They think that they have VERY LITTLE willpower.

Isn't that interesting?

Individuals who struggle and individuals who are successful believe the same thing about their willpower.

Hmmm... so what's the difference?

First and foremost, those that are successful don't rely on willpower to be successful.

They understand that willpower is a finite resource and it can get drained pretty quickly throughout each day.

Therefore, they adjust their environment so that willpower isn't required.

For example, they don't keep that steamy plate of brownies in plain sight. (I literally cannot even have the box of mix in the house.)

They don't have a whole list of things that are off-limits.

They don't eliminate entire categories.

They don't restrict themselves.

So, willpower isn't needed as much, which keeps their willpower battery charged longer for when they actually need it (like during extra stressful times).

Individuals that struggle rely way too much on willpower.

They have arbitrary rules about what they can and can't do (willpower gets drained).

They often restrict themselves (willpower drained).

They have brownies in plain sight at work or at home (willpower drained).

Then they wonder why they eventually break.

The second piece to this puzzle is the perception of one decision.

Those that are successful understand that things are never going to be perfect, so one poor decision doesn't rattle them at all.

They know it's part of the process and they're able to pick up and move forward.

Those that struggle tend to overreact to one poor decision. Once again, thinking that it's confirmation of their inconsistency, lack of willpower, or lack of discipline.

Usually, it's a direct result of the rules they're placing on themselves.

So what's the solution?

Simple.

Stop relying so heavily on willpower.

Set up your environment in a way that willpower isn't needed as much.

Stop creating arbitrary rules and stop restricting yourself.

Finally, accept that failure is an inevitable part of the process and that each decision is an opportunity to learn and grow.

Take that approach, and success becomes inevitable.

If you need help implementing this, that's one of our specialties.
