

Using seasoning and condiments is a great way to spice up what otherwise would be a bland and tasteless meal. Using these helps add flavor and promotes variety when ingredients are limited. Within this video, Chris discusses how to determine which spices and flavor enhancers are good or neutral, when to or not to use them, and when to limit their use.

Chris's Key Takeaways

Salt and sodium-containing condiments will help retain water when calories are restricted.

Refrain from restricting salt from meal prepping unless there is a need to do so.

Using spices and seasoning high in garlic and onion can lead to digestive issues when overconsumed.

Excessive intake of iodized salt can negatively impact the thyroid.

Bone broth adds moisture and flavor to an otherwise bland meal.

Many condiments, especially tomato-based, contain calories and will impact caloric intake when consumed in greater quantities.

Be mindful of the quantity of hot sauce used due to the risk of causing reflux.
