

Part II: Preferences and Planning

Navigating travel when meal prepping can often be tricky, especially when there is limited access to store and keep ingredients cool. In this video, Chris provides his go-to process food travel strategies ranging from going out for an afternoon to international travel.

Chris's Key Takeaways

Use flat ice packs placed around food when traveling for more than 24 hours.

When traveling overnight, only portion meals for immediate consumption in addition to packing the bulk foods to be portioned later.

Anytime substitution is a last resort, always try to mimic the existing meal plan.

When traveling for multiple days, locating and staying in a place with a kitchenette can simulate an at-home meal-prepping experience.

When traveling, keep meals simple to ensure consistency and control.

If there is a preference to grocery shop, bring bulk meats because they are often the hardest to navigate while traveling.

Review food travel restrictions before any international travel.

Store in the refrigerator overnight any food that will be vacuum sealed.

Vacuum sealing 1lb portions of meat makes it easier to thaw and consume within a day.

Use ice bags while traveling on a plane versus refreezing ice packs for convenient cycling.

When traveling on a plane, using soft coolers make it easier to fit in overhead compartment or under the seat.

When traveling with food for multiple days, bring three meal containers to be cycled out using a cooler bag packed with bulk foods.

Use a pill organizer to pack supplement pills needed only for a given travel period.

When traveling internationally, store all foods in plastic containers.

The best meat protein to travel with are chicken, followed by steak.
