

When you're writing a bio, messaging should be short and to the point. Try writing your story in three parts: the conflict, the resolution, and what you do now or how you fit in. Before you begin, think critically about what you've experienced and achieved that may be valuable to clients. These items may include, but are not limited to:

- Certifications, degrees, or other official credentials
- Years in the industry
- Recognizable clients (elite athletes, celebrities, etc.)
- Features in press, magazines, local news, etc.
- Milestones, accomplishments, or awards
- Speaking gigs
- Core values or principles
- Personal transformation story

Here's an industry example

CONFLICT: Dr. Mallory Fox is a movement specialist with a passion for helping people live a healthier and happier life inside and outside of the gym. As a former competitive swimmer constantly on the go, Mallory struggled to find balance while putting herself through school, working full time, and staying connected to her community.

RESOLUTION: Her 15 years in the health and fitness industry showed her that she wasn't alone in the struggle to find work-life balance. Mallory started to practice mindfulness to become aware of her in-the-moment instinctual choices and found it to be a powerful tool to live a more fulfilled life. A simple shift in her routine created such a ripple effect that clients, friends, and family noticed!

HOW THE FITNESS PROFESSIONAL FITS IN: Now, Mallory helps other high-achieving people make the shift for their wellbeing through mindful movement and mindset coaching in her online community of 60,000 people.

Now it's your turn!
