

Influence on Weight Loss Maintenance	How to Address
Diet Composition	1. Have the client consume an adequate fiber intake (>25g for women, >38g for men). 2. Increase protein intake until they are consuming the target amount (~1.7 g/kg or higher). 3. Give recommendations on how to prepare and consume meals of low-calorie density. 4. Encourage and reinforce healthy food choices and the importance of an overall healthy diet pattern. 5. Avoid overly restrictive rules that undermine adherence.
Physical Activity	1. Have clients engage in some physical activity each day, such as making a short walk a normal part of their routine. 2. Help them find an enjoyable type of activity that is likely to become a consistent part of their lifestyle. 3. Program a combination of resistance exercise and aerobic exercise. 4. Help clients find many ways to be active outside of planned exercise sessions. 5. A target of 200 to 300 minutes of activity per week may be required.
Accountability & Self-monitoring	1. Regular self-weighing may be useful for many, but not all, clients. 2. Have clients self-monitor dietary intake in some form: food diary, photos of meals, portions of vegetables, etc. 3. Provide accountability by clients working with a coach, who will have regular check-ins and touch base via email/text as necessary. 4. Encourage the client to seek out support groups or communities with similar goals that can also provide accountability.
Food Environment	1. Get the client to be mindful about the foods kept in the home and where they are kept. 2. Have the client set up home and work environments to limit exposure to tempting foods. 3. Make clients aware of social events or time with friends where food will be present. Plan ahead about each situation and how it will be navigated. 4. Encourage clients to prepare healthy snacks and meals in advance for times where hunger hits, to decrease the temptation to get convenience foods.
Psychological Factors	1. Encourage the use of flexible dietary restraint, or flexible control of diet. 2. Have the client focus on reasons why engaging in a behavior is important for internal reasons, rather than external. 3. Help clients build self-efficacy through setting realistic goals and reminding them of their progress and successes. 4. If there are serious body image issues, consider referring the client to a psychology professional. 5. Reinforce the idea that individual clients have control over their lives and behaviors (e.g. "genes do not equal destiny", etc.).
